22.10.04.01 Curriculum Committee

- Moved [Nyaga/Ridout]: that the Algoma University Senate approve the course revision to ENGL/BIOL3137 as submitted by the Department of English and History:

From:

ENGL/BIOL3137 Reading Darwin and His Contemporaries

In this course students will read Charles Darwin's On The Origin of Species and study him in his natural habitat – the Victorian Period – to see his ideas in conversation with those of his contemporaries. Students will explore how significant writers and thinkers of the time, working in fiction, poetry, criticism, philosophy, and psychology, take up Darwin's ideas and his theory of evolution and inquire into their implications for civilization, culture, self-knowledge, and our perception of the natural world. Students may not retain credit for both ENGL 3137 and BIOL 3137. Prerequisite: ENGL 1006/1007. [SEM 3/EXP] 3 cr

To:

ENGL/BIOL3137 Making the World Anew

The nineteenth century was a deeply unsettled age in which questions about the value of literature, the meaning of history, the truth in morality, and the existence of god inspired ways of knowing that remain with us today and virtually extinguished some past traditions. Students will explore how major writers and thinkers, working in fiction, poetry, criticism, philosophy, and psychology, formulate ideas and investigate new methods of knowing and telling that made lasting impressions on civilization, language, thinking and feeling, selfhood, and how we compose reality. Students may not retain credit for both ENGL 3137 and BIOL 3137.

Prerequisite: ENGL 1006/1007. [SEM 3/EXP] 3 cr

Rationale:

The course will no longer have a structure that focuses on Darwin's "On the Origin of Species". Instead, students will be reading and discussing a selection of major literary and philosophical works written in the 19th century. Darwin's presence will be reduced to a representative excerpt, making room for works of poetry and other writings.

The previous iteration of the course was intended as an experiment to draw students from biology and other disciplines. Very few students from outside English enrolled in the course. It is time to try something different.

Motion carried.
